DOUGLAS COUNTY, Kan. — Douglas County District Attorney Suzanne Valdez said Friday that her office will not prosecute any case under Kansas Senate Bill 180.

The bill, referred to as the “women’s bill of rights” by supporters and "the bathroom bill" by opponents, will go into law next month after legislators were able to override Gov. Laura Kelly’s veto during the legislative calendar.

The Kansas bill defines male and female based on a person’s physical anatomy at birth and prohibits transgender people from using restrooms and locker rooms.

“As District Attorney, I was deeply saddened when this law was passed,” Valdez said in a statement. “In today’s chaotic world where we should treat one another with dignity, understanding and compassion, the Kansas legislature chose to create a law that is senseless and, quite frankly, potentially dangerous to our trans community.”

She said her office will “continue to focus our efforts on ensuring public safety by prosecuting crimes committed against children, sexual assault matters, gun violence and all other violent crime," according to a statement provided.

WATCH: Teens decode slang from 2001 like 'tight,' 'oasis'

Do you feel me? Bling blinging? A dime piece? If you're scratching your head, you're not alone. This is just some of the esoteric slang that kids used back in 2001. One reporter was stumped about their meanings herself. She enlisted the help of some “super hip” high school seniors to help decode the cryptic jargon.
